The present invention relates to a vascular perfusion circuit, and, more particularly, to a perfusion circuit having a constant flow rate. Vascular perfusion circuits are used to irrigate a patient's tissues with a fluid such as, for example, a saline solution, at a certain flow rate. In order to accomplish this, it is desirable that the flow rate and/or pressure of the fluid delivered to the patient be constant, regardless of whether the input to the circuit is a constant or variable input source. One conventional circuit includes a variable flow rate input device that includes a high pressure or high speed syringe which is constantly filled and attached to a first luer fitting located on a valve. The fluid from the syringe is then passed to a valve which delivers the fluid to a patient. Another conventional circuit includes a constant flow rate input device that includes a tube in communication with a regulator located inside a refrigerator. The refrigerated environment tends to maintain the proper temperature for the fluid, thereby causing the fluid to flow at a constant flow rate. The above-described conventional circuits have a number of deficiencies. One deficiency is that the flow rate and/or pressure of the fluid delivered to the patient is not constant, which is undesirable. Another deficiency is that the conventional circuits are overly complicated, thereby increasing manufacturing costs. A further deficiency is that the conventional circuits include a number of parts and/or require several steps for Major psychosis in an Egyptian family: a case report. In this article we describe a family with symptoms of major psychosis. There were four generations of affected family members; the proband was a man in his early 40s. There were three affected females and one affected male in two generations. The patients' histories revealed that there was first-degree consanguinity between the 2nd and 3rd generations. The patient's father and uncle both had major depression. Most of the psychiatric symptoms were of an atypical nature, consisting of affective and psychological symptoms. The final diagnosis was made with reference to the criteria in DSM-IV and ICD-10.
